I. READING COMPREHENSION (12 marks)

1. Abby's hand shoots up nearly every time her teacher asks the 19 active first-graders in her Philadelphia public school to match letters of the alphabet to the sounds they make. Sitting up front, Abby, 7, looks as eager as any of her classmates to give a quick answer. But every time the teacher calls on her, Abby freezes. She strains to respond and her words are inaudible. She's effectively mute throughout the school day. Her only communication is just few words whispered to a trusted girlfriend.
2. At home, however, Abby is a different child. She loves to play with her brother Jack, 5. "She speaks loudly and can be bossy toward her brother," says mother Lisa Barnes. Abby is, in every other way, a perfectly normal child who has no shortage of extracurricular activities, including horseback-riding lessons and dance classes that she's been attending since she was 4.
3. So why doesn't she speak up in class ? What may at first glance look like shyness is actually something far more complex. Abby, like hundreds of thousands of kids across the US, is suffering from a little-understood childhood disorder called selective mutism. According to psychiatrists, a child who has developed normally at home but has not talked at school or in other social situations for at least a month is a strong candidate for a diagnosis of SM.
4. SM can strike at any age, even among children who once talked in public, but it usually becomes obvious by age 3 or 4. The root of the problem in most cases is an extreme form of social anxiety or phobia. "It is a fear that can literally make it impossible to speak," says Dr. Elisa Blum, who specializes in treating selective mutism. As with most social anxieties, SM is more common in girls and is believed to have a strong genetic component. About 70% of kids with SM have an immediate family member who also struggles with social anxiety.

Being a parent is the greatest of life's joys, but it is also one of the most difficult jobs in the world. There are times that it seems like an insurmountable to get your children to eat the right things, including an amount of fruits and vegetables. The national health guidelines suggest that kids get at least five portions of fruits and vegetables each day. this may seem like quite a lot, it isn't really difficult to get these five servings into a day. You can serve a whole piece of fruit, such as a banana or an orange, with the breakfast. lunchtime, you could serve something on the side of a meal, such as carrots with peanut butter and raisins on them. Dinner is a good time for vegetables, but use fresh varieties that are offered either uncooked or..... . This will help your child to get most of the nutrients out of the produce.
